The 18-time gold medalist is more than a month into his comeback, and he's not enjoying it. It's even distracting him from the pursuit of more titles in his famous sport. Phelps did not win a medal at the U.S. Olympic Trials, which were held from June 18-21 at the C. Milton Wright Center in his hometown of Detroit. He came in 12th, narrowly missing out on a medal, after a shock defeat to five-time Olympic medalist Ryan Lochte in the 100m backstroke. Phelps was otherwise stellar in Detroit, winning six gold medals and bringing home the most gold medals for the United States in an Olympic Games. Phelps had high expectations heading into the 2016 Summer Olympics in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The U.S. team failed to medal for the first time in 40 years at the Olympics. But Phelps ultimately managed to rack up seven medals, including five golds, after being unable to catch race-winning breaststroker Katie Ledecky. Since then, he's gone from in control to unhinged, and the whole world has noticed. The U.S. Olympic Committee sent out an email to its employees on June 20 that included an essay from Phelps addressing his comeback. "While I'm in the process of re-learning and developing the skills that I need to dominate again, I just couldn't help but notice that the athlete I was before my surgery isn't the athlete I am today," he wrote. "I'm not the 'overgrown child' or the 'loser' or the 'overindulger' you see in the newspaper. 82157476af
